The morning sun streaming across the Nile Delta is both beautiful and particularly good at waking you up. Leila rolled away but could not escape it. With a sigh, she heaved off the new flax linen blanket that Father had bought her from the market and stretched.

“Wake up, sleepy head!”

Leila groaned. Father liked to remind her how lucky she was to have both her own room and a window, but she didn't feel lucky. She rolled up the reed cover, which kept out the heat of the day but always seemed to let in greedy bugs and endless noise. It especially let in noise – and today, the city of Bubastis was alive with it.

Leila had learned to tell the time of day from the noise. She woke to the clattering of her neighbours' doors. Then, she dragged herself out of bed to the chit-chat of passers-by heading to the reservoir. After that, she ate breakfast to the banging and crashing of merchants on their way to market. When Nasir from next door began to shout at Rudjek to get ready for school, it was time to start the day.
